Russell Lee joined the photographic staff of the Resettlement Administration (RA), which was renamed the Farm Security Administration (FSA) in 1937. Both the RA and the FSA were New Deal programs created to assist poor and destitute farmers during the Dust Bowl and the Great Depression. He worked directly under the creative supervision of Roy Stryker, the head of the Historical Section and the director of photographic projects.
The Historical Section’s purpose and function was to publicize and gain national support for the FSA, through the dissemination of photographs illustrating the plight of tenant farmers, sharecroppers, and migrant workers. Stryker’s documentary team created 77,000 still photographs from 1935 until 1942; many of these were published in a variety of newspapers, books and magazines. His graphic designers and editors produced posters and exhibitions of these photographs that toured cities around the United States, educating mostly urban Americans about the country’s rural problems.
Lee created some of the most iconic images the FSA produced.
His colleagues at the FSA included Ben Shahn, Dorothea Lange, Arthur Rothstein, Jack Delano and Walker Evans. Like most of his colleagues, Lee shot both 35mm and medium format film for the FSA.
