Alley Cat Rescue's Guide to Managing Community Cats Louise Holton
Animal control agencies have been trying to manage feral cat populations for decades with no success. The vicious cycle of catch-and-kill has done nothing to reduce the number of cats living outdoors and taxpayers continue to foot the hefty bill. Perpetually killing cats is a time-intensive affair, which places unnecessary stress on already limited shelter resources, and cats pay the ultimate price with their lives. Fortunately, there is a more effective and humane solution ... Trap-Neuter-Return (TNR). TNR programs have been shown to dramatically cut costs and time, freeing up valuable resources so more animals can be saved. With cats being the number one companion animal in America, the public no longer supports lethal management practices. Communities across the country and around the world are embracing TNR as the preferred method for controlling outdoor cats. However, as TNR programs continue to increase, their opponents become more vocal. Leading the charge, many environmental and conservation groups have mounted a campaign blaming cats for the decline in bird and wildlife populations, and they are pushing government agencies to make TNR illegal. Despite national and world reports that name human activity - such as habitat destruction, climate change, pollution, and pesticides - the culprit of disappearing bird and wildlife species, these groups continue to scapegoat cats. Within these pages, you will find an abundance of scientific evidence dispelling the misinformation, along with a how-to guide for safely implementing a successful TNR program. Community cats need our help now more than ever, and with Alley Cat Rescue's Guide, you will have the necessary tools to make a lasting difference in your neighborhood and the world.
