Mind and Process: Why free will and physics both work John Lunde
For years, materialists have said that the mind is just material process from the inside, without ever realizing that our minds are therefore the most direct evidence about the nature of material process that we have - and that our minds have qualities which contradict how we think these processes work.

"Mind and Process" explores these contradictions and asks a simple question: "how must the physical world be, in order for our minds to exist?" It argues not only that 'free will' exists, but that the efficient mind we see in ourselves necessitates a world in which the shape, and even the internal contradictions, of modern physics is simultaneously arbitrary, inevitable, and valid.
